PREFACE

Introductory Remarks . . .

This first edition of the newly established Case Western Reserve Journal of International Law reflects a growing student awareness of the importance of international law for all peoples today. The Journal seeks to promote scholarship and interest in the fields of international and comparative law by publishing lead articles, student notes and comments, and book reviews. The purpose of the Journal is to stimulate student involvement and scholarship in these fields and to present readers of the Journal with informative diversified and current material of interest.

As this is the second legal journal to be published at Case Western Reserve School of Law, new opportunities are open to the student body to participate in scholarly legal writing and editing. The Journal has been financially sponsored to a great extent by the CWRU Student Bar Association. The Staff wishes to thank that organization and the students and faculty of our law school for having made this endeavor possible.

. . . from the Student Bar Association

The burden and the glory emanating from a good law school's emergence into greatness encompasses the duty to assure optimal opportunity for superior student ability to provide the profession with imaginative, informative and incisive legal writing. We trust this auspicious first edition meets this responsibility and we hope the future will feature even more significant contributions to the community of scholars we proudly serve.

ROBERT M. SHEAHEN, president, CWRU Student Bar Assoc.

. . . from the International Law Society

The Case Western Reserve International Law Society welcomes the first issue of the Journal. Because of the interest in this new publication, we look forward to a greater awareness at this law school of problems of international law and international business transactions. Although the Journal and the Society are independent, it is certain that they will complement and strengthen each other, and provide the students of this school with a fine opportunity for outstanding work in the field of international law.

FRANK I. HARDING III, president, CWRU Int'l Law Society
